TEN10 WRC CHAMPIONSHIP

AVENGERS, ASSEMBLE !

The wait is over: Ten10 WRC season 4 kicked off this week, and with the most legendary rally of them all – Monte Carlo. An expanded calendar, a lot of fresh faces and the return of classic rallying: everything is set for a wild ride.

Motsky

The Ten10 Rally Championship is back! After three increasingly competitive seasons, Season 4 marks a new chapter for the league. This year's championship takes us back in time to the 2004 WRC season, that has the character and challenge of early-2000s machinery, while sending drivers across a calendar that mixes asphalt, gravel, and snow. As always, versatility will be key, with each surface demanding a different approach.

The grid itself also reaches a new milestone. For the first time in the league's history, the Championship brings together 39 drivers and six full teams representing six manufacturers, creating the deepest and most competitive field the series has ever seen. With more drivers, more teams, and more points on the line, the fight for both the drivers' and manufacturers' titles promises to be tighter than ever.

HUNGRY FOR MORE

Among the drivers returning with unfinished business is Speedhunter, last season's vice-champion. His 2025 campaign was a turbulent ►

GTI's Cordoba tearing up the ice on its way to winning the season's first Power Stage one, only coming together late in the year before he secured second place overall in the final round by just a handful of points. Now he returns not only as a contender, but also as a team captain, leading Team Miso Sideways in a Subaru Impreza.

“We're ready for some good fun, and fierce competition”

Looking back at last season, he admits the start was rough: “I felt I got off to a very underwhelming start. Way off the pace in Monte-Carlo, an uncharacteristic mistake in Sweden that cost me a second-place finish and then tire problems in Mexico and Corsica. I knew I was better than this and really felt like I started to turn it around after Corsica. I ran what I thought was a great rally there — other than when I sent it off a cliff.”

The turnaround eventually paid off: “After Corsica it had all kind of came together, and I snagged up second place [in the driver's championship] by the last rally. Super stoked to be back, especially with all this fierce competition.”

Season 4 also puts him in a new position as team leader — something he seems excited to explore. “Teammates seem really cool, curious on how to get better which I love. I've known Danny since we were back in our other rally group, so I knew no matter what I was gonna pick him up because he has shown great potential with his pace and he's just an awesome dude.” And as for the car, the team is confident in their choice: “Honestly, I couldn't be any happier with my car. I wanted a car that was a bit more approachable than some of the other ones and I feel like we nailed it out of the park with the Subaru. We're just ready for some good fun, and fierce competition.”

GUESS WHO'S BACK ?

Another major storyline this season is the return of Kip Duncle, who steps back into the championship after sitting out Season 3. In rally history, comebacks are never unheard of — sometimes ► a pause is exactly what a driver needs to return sharper than ever. Kip's early-stage times in Monte Carlo suggest that his return could follow a similar script, although the rally quickly reminded him how unforgiving the sport can be.

"It was not until that son of a bitch said the word 'patchy ice' that my elation and excitement from the draft and qualifying stages wore off and I remembered that I wasn't in Croatia anymore," he joked. "After white-knuckling my way through stage one and crossing the finish line, I come to see that I'm a minute plus behind these aliens that Motsky brought here to show us what real rally racers look like." The gap may have been a shock, but it quickly turned into motivation: "I couldn't help but think to myself: why did I do this again? Then I realized — wait, I did not do this to myself... Motsky has done this to ME and somehow dozens of others."

“The Frenchman whose sadism rivals even the namesake of sadism himself”

Now back in the championship, Kip says the objective is simple: keep pushing forward and see where the pace leads.

"So it is with a newfound target to pin on my rig to remind myself why we are here that I rally forward through this season, with the hopes of keeping pace with the Frenchman whose sadism in choice of rallyes and conditions rivals only his countryman and namesake of sadism himself." If the opening stages are anything to go by, his comeback could become one of the defining stories of the season.

DEFENDING THE CROWN

Defending a championship is never simple. After conquering the drivers' title last season, Reaven returns to the Ten10 Rally Championship with a target firmly on his back. Season 4 promises a deeper field than ever, but the reigning champion seems more than ready to dive back into the fight. For him, simply returning to the stages already feels like a win: "It's super nice to be back. Since this is the only racing game I play, I'm glad to get on my wheel again, and this time we have lots of new and strong players that will make everything more interesting. With bigger teams and more cars, it will be amazing."

“Lots of new players that will make things interesting”

Last season's title didn't come from dominating every stage. Instead, Reaven attributes much of his success to a different strength — consistency. "Being honest I know I'm not the fastest driver, but I think I'm kinda 'consistent'. I never push it to the limit but that makes it easier to avoid big mistakes. Doesn't matter if you are the fastest driver on one ► or two stages if on the third one you decide to hug a tree.” He also acknowledges that rallying often includes a bit of fortune. “Luck was a bit on my side last season. That, and the fact that Sheikh missed the first two rallies.”

This season, Reaven returns not only as champion but also as a team captain, a role he approaches with characteristic humility. “It’s fine, I would prefer to have someone faster as a captain but that’s ok. I usually try to talk with the team a bit about how they feel each rally, the car, setups, etc.” For him, the team aspect is one of the defining strengths of this championship. “I think part of the fun of the Ten10 championship is the fact that we have actual teams and we are not just on our own doing stages week after week.”

Looking at Season 4 as a whole, the defending champion seems enthusiastic about the direction the league is taking. “I like it. I loved the Season 3 cars and the new cars are also super cool. Even if I don’t have a lot of experience with them, they feel nice to drive, and since they aren’t as fast as the last season ones, more people might enjoy the event and try to finish it instead of giving up.”

With the defending champion back on the grid, Season 4 now has its benchmark. Consistent, methodical, and quietly effective, Reaven proved last season that rally championships are not always won by the outright fastest driver — but often by the one who makes the fewest mistakes.

Even though the season started a few days ago, the paddock is already buzzing with activity. Custom-made liveries are appearing across the grid, practice sessions are multiplying, and teams are already deep into refining strategy and setups. The preparation alone reflects the dynamism of the championship — teams experimenting and pushing to find those extra tenths. And behind it all is the same thing: a clear hunger for results and the desire to fight for victory. ■

TEN10 OVAL LEAGUE

WE RACE IN CIRCLES... OR DO WE ?

Thursday nights have quietly become one of the most entertaining grassroots oval battlegrounds on the service. What began as a simple Street Stock league built around close racing and a welcoming grid, quickly evolved into tight packs, improving drivers, and a few familiar names rising to the front.

Motsky, Ppoole

The green flag is about to wave on season 2 of the Ten10 Oval Series, and if Season 1 proved anything, it's that Thursday nights have become one of the most entertaining Ten10 Motorsports iRacing series. Built around a simple idea – fun and fast cars, close racing, and a welcoming grid – the league has quickly grown into a competitive but relaxed environment where drivers of all levels can jump in and fight for position.

With most drivers carrying an iRating below 2K, the emphasis stays exactly where it should be: learning together while still pushing hard for the win. According to organizer Ppoole (Ed. Note: the coolest man on Earth), the spirit of the league has always been rooted in grassroots racing: “The Thursday league has been focused on short tracks in the Street Stock class. Most races look very much like the oval racing found in small towns across the States.”

Over the course of the season, drivers have steadily improved their race craft, learning to run multiple lines and, most importantly, how to preserve their tires during the race. ►

One driver in particular has set the pace — Carl, who has dominated every race he entered so far. “The Ten10 group as a whole has dramatically improved their race craft over the course of the season,” Ppoole explained, pointing to the increasingly competitive mid-pack battles that now define many races.

“The group has dramatically improved their race craft”

The format remains simple : the lobby opens Thursday at 8:30 PM Eastern, qualifying begins at 9:00 PM, and the pack rolls onto the track shortly after. Behind the scenes, the league is organized by Ppoole, Badrhymes and Shommie Shine, who keep the season running smoothly while still giving the community a voice in shaping the future.

The schedule itself tests every type of oval skill. The championship rotates through intermediate tracks, short tracks, and superspeedways — repeating that pattern four times to create a balanced 12-race calendar. The sequence breaks only once near the end of the season, when the field heads to Indianapolis Motor Speedway at the same time as the real-world Indianapolis 500, giving the league its own version of one of motorsport’s most legendary venues.

This past week marked the final session before the series takes its next step in season 2. As Ppoole noted, “We now move on to the ARCA, street stock cars and more NASCAR Cup tracks,” a transition that promises a new challenge for the forever improving field.

More than the cars or the tracks, though, Ten10 is defined by its atmosphere — custom liveries, shared setups, friendly rivalries, and plenty of battles that feel just as intense as the fight for the win. And with the barrier to entry nearly nonexistent, there’s always room for another driver on the grid when Thursday night rolls around. ■

RETHINKING IMMERSION

Welcome to another Carpool with Stenzel. This time we're talking haptics and motion systems — technologies that, according to him, have truly changed the name of the game. Here's a quick conversation about how these tools are reshaping the way we build and experience simracing.

Motsky, Stenzel

Hey Stenzel, hope you're doing well! If I remember correctly, you have quite a few motion and haptic systems on your rig, one of them being a Buttkicker. Why do you think it's the best for immersion?

Buttkicker, or any bass shaker, will give you the biggest jump in immersion for the least amount of money. It simulates engine vibration, curbs, gear shifts, tire slip, lock-ups, abs, traction control, and so much more. Makes you feel 90% of the things that motion rigs do, but at a fraction of the cost.

If someone just wants a bit more feedback without spending a fortune, what would you start with?

I'd probably start with pedal upgrades — elastomers, dampers or even pedal haptics from companies like Simagic. Better pedal feel improves consistency immediately. If they wanted more physical feedback, Next Level Racing and a few others sell seat-mounted vibration cushions. It's basically a group of transducers that are attached to a seat cover and it buckles ►

Stenzel's (almost) perfect rig, built over the years

around your existing seat. The benefit to that is the haptic vibrations are transferred directly to your body vs. resonating through a rig.

You have a lot on your rig. What part of it gives you the most satisfaction ?

The way all the parts work together to deliver an immersive experience. It's hard but if I had to pick a single component, it would be the motion and belt tensioner. There really isn't anything else that gives a visceral immersive experience like feeling Sebring's bumpy circuit beneath me, the weightlessness when I hit a massive jump at Estonia or feeling the simulated G forces in a hypercar at Silverstone. In terms of pure fun, the motion system and belt tensioner put the biggest smile on my face.

Does the seatbelt tensioner really make that much of a difference ?

It's not just a gimmick. It really adds a layer of realism you can't get any other way. Under braking and cornering load, it tricks your brain into feeling G-forces by putting an insane amount of pressure on the corresponding belt. And when the car begins to lose traction, the belt loosens and there's a small amount of vibrations that let me know I'm driving past the limit. It also does other haptic feedback besides simulated G-forces which you can tune to your liking. It's not essential, but once you have it, you notice when it's missing.

If you had unlimited budget, what would you upgrade first on your current rig ?

No limit? I'd go for a higher-end motion system without a doubt. It's the most expensive part to improve, and better motion transforms the whole experience.

And all that said, if you could pick only one upgrade, which would it be ?

For immersion, the Buttkicker would be the number one thing I'd recommend. Nothing else gives more smiles-per-dollar and the feedback is really important. For driving performance, then it has to be a good set of hydraulic or load cell pedals. Those are my top two game changer picks. ■
