

TEN10 AUTO

TEN10 ACC
PORSCHE CUP

SRC
9 HRS OF KYALAMI

WRC
SEASON 3 GUIDE

WRC TEN10 CHAMPIONSHIP

A NEW BEGINNING

SRC 6 HOURS OF WATKINS GLEN

VERGULD VS THE INTERNET...

THE END OF TEN10'S SRC CAMPAIGN ?

R 20000 - 001 - F: 1,00€

F: 1,00€; LUX - 1,50€
B: 2,00€; UK - 1,50€; IT - 3,50€
D: 2,60€; US - 2,50$; CAN - 4,00$

CONTENTS

ISSUE N°4 / AUGUST 25TH 2025

6

RACES

- 3 TEN10 WRC
Season 3 overview
- 6 SRC THE PROPER ONE
Round 5 – Watkins Glen
- 7 SRC THE PROPER ONE
Round 7 – Kyalami
- 8 TEN10 PORSCHE CUP
Season recap

3

THE DRIVERS

- 6 MOTSKY, TOASTY,
KIP & VERGULD
6 Hours of Watkins Glen
- 7 ACE
9 Hours of Kyalami
- 8 E. KHAN
Porsche cup

TEN10 WRC CHAMPIONSHIP

A BRAND-NEW DAY

The wait is over: Ten10 WRC season 3 kicks off this week, and with the most legendary rally of them all – Monte Carlo. An expanded calendar, regulation changes, fresh faces and the return of classic rallying: everything is set for a wild ride.

Motsky

Season 3 marks a turning point for the Ten10 championship. After the chaos and growing pains of Season 2, a regulation reset was necessary to strike the right balance between realism, competition, and fun. Rallies are now back to the classic seven-day format, running from Sunday to Sunday. Another major change comes in the shape of rally length. This season brings a more dynamic approach, inspired by the golden days of WRC in the 80s. Endurance-oriented rounds such as Monte Carlo and Kenya will stretch to about an hour, built around fewer but longer stages. On the other hand, sprint rounds like Sweden or Corsica will deliver shorter bursts of around 45 minutes, with snappier and quicker stages, offering up to ten in a single rally. Service areas have also been revisited. Every rally will now feature three long services, giving drivers room to breathe, fix their cars properly, and adapt their setups across the event. Damage has been tuned down from hardcore to normal: mistakes are still punished, cars can still break, and a rally can still end in the bottom of a ditch, but the likelihood of a single slip ending everything has been reduced. Season 3 sees a return to 4WD machinery, with teams competing in WRC cars from 2017 - 2021. ►

The calendar grows to nine rounds this year, bringing a wide mix of surfaces and rally styles across four continents. It all begins with the crown jewel, Monte Carlo, where tarmac, ice, and snow mix into a strategic nightmare. Sweden's frozen forests follow, before the heat and altitude of Mexico put cars and drivers to the test. Corsica then delivers its relentless twisty mountain roads, while Kenya pushes endurance to the limit on brutal African tracks. Sardinia's dusty gravel and Deutschland's shifting surfaces each demand precision. Then follows Catalonia's smooth asphalt, a high-speed test of precision and consistency before the season ends in Indonesia, a tropical newcomer promising monsoon chaos right to the end.

If the calendar looks intense, the grid looks even fiercer. The new drivers have already made their mark in qualifying. They may be fresh blood, but they resemble vampires more than rookies. Ironically, leading the way is Sir Dracula, who stunned the field by posting the fastest cumulative time in the qualifying event. In doing so, he dethroned Racut, who until now had been untouchable in every rally he contested, but only by the slimmest of margins — seven tenth of a second separate the two. The gauntlet has been thrown, and the field is tighter than ever. With heavy hitters like Azazel and Racut now joined by Dracula and a wave of fresh talent, and without forgetting the return of big names, like Bship and Acollador, the fight for supremacy looks brutal at the top and relentless throughout the midfield.

Season 3 promises classic rally thrills. The adjustments made from last season aim to create the best of both worlds: the realism and challenge that rallying fans crave, combined with accessibility that ensures the championship stays fun for everyone. Nine rallies, four-wheel drive monsters, and the most competitive grid yet set the stage for a season destined to go down in Ten10 WRC history. The story begins in Monte Carlo, but from its icy Alpine passes to the tropical jungles of Indonesia, the road ahead will push everyone to the test. Buckle up — Ten10 WRC Season 3 has begun. ■

The very fast and jumpy Estonian roads were the stage for the qualifying round

2025 TEN10 RALLY CHAMPIONSHIP

SEASON 3 CALENDAR

SRC ENDURANCE – 6 HOURS OF WATKINS GLEN

VERGULD VS THE INTERNET

It was supposed to be just another round of endurance racing. Ten10's Ferrari was running steady, holding a respectable position and looking set for a clean 6-hour race. But then came the enemy of every sim racer: lag. The whole tantrum that followed turned this network hiccup into needless drama and ended up bringing a premature end to Ten10's run in the SRC championship.

Motsky

The opening stages of the SRC 6 hours of Watkins Glen looked promising for Puff Puff Passed You, the Ferrari 296 GT3 entry under the Ten10 banner. For the first four hours of racing, everything seemed under control. Motsky took the wheel for the initial stint, delivering a clean, disciplined drive. It wasn't blisteringly fast, but it was steady and consistent—exactly what the team needed to establish itself in a solid position. When Toasty and Kip followed, they built on that foundation with stints that showed grit and growing pace. Despite qualifying at the back, the Ferrari was climbing the order with measured determination. Then came Verguld's double stint. At first, things continued smoothly. The car was holding pace, the rhythm was set, and the team's plan was unfolding as expected. But murmurs began to circulate from rival garages: some were noticing connection issues, pointing out that Verguld's car was starting to lag. At first, it was manageable. But then came the moment no one could have predicted. ►

The fateful moment when the DriversRoom car materialized right in front of poor Verguld

Out of nowhere, in what could only be described as divine intervention, the DriversRoom car materialized directly in front of Verguld's Ferrari. It was the kind of bizarre, ghostly teleportation that only netcode can conjure. A collision was unavoidable.

The real impact, however, came not from the crash, but from the reaction. The DriversRoom camp, rather than acknowledging the cruel hand of the internet gods, launched into a tirade against Verguld. Sarcastic, cutting, and more than a little childish, their response was out of proportion to the incident. These were supposed to be adults, yet their behavior had more in common with spoiled children throwing a tantrum. Verguld — hampered by the simple fact that his router lives two floors beneath his rig — was painted as the villain in an episode that was nobody's fault, and what could have been a long, competitive season ended abruptly, bringing the Ten10 SRC campaign to a premature close.

And yet, there is still a glimmer of pride in the story. Ace, ever the unshakable warrior, refused to let the team's spirit die. With unmatched determination, he pledged to carry the Ten10 colors into the 9 Hours of Kyalami, driving the 296 GT3 on his own. Ace honored the work, the struggles, and the resilience of his teammates. For many, it would have been the end. For Ace, it is simply the next chapter.

Unfortunately, SRC's servers collapsed once again (ed. note: just like at Spa), and after five grueling hours the race was brought to a premature red flag. Yet in that chaos, Ace had already made his statement. He is more than a driver — he is living proof of what commitment looks like at its purest. When the Ferrari 296 GT3 takes to the track again, it won't represent what was lost but rather stand as a testament to the unbreakable spirit of the man behind the wheel.

God speed, Ace. ■

TEN10 PORSCHE CUP SEASON

UP, UP, AND AWAY

The Ten10 Porsche Cup promised tight racing, unforgiving cars, and a sprint-style calendar where every single round carried championship-level weight. It delivered all that and more—before fading out in a bittersweet finale.

Motsky, E. Khan

The Ten10 Porsche Cup was never designed to be long. A short, snappy calendar meant every race carried ten times the usual pressure, with standings reshuffling after each round and no time to recover from mistakes. For some, that made it stressful. For others, it made it unforgettable. One of those voices is E. Khan, who looks back at the season with unshakable fondness.

“The season itself was a short, snappy calendar that made every race worth a million times more than the last”, Khan recalled. “It kept everyone checking the standings to see how the pecking order changed after every race. It was a format I really enjoyed and want to see more of in sim racing in general”.

“It barrels down the straights like it wants to exit the stratosphere”

And then there was the car. The Porsche Cup, beloved and infamous in equal measure, has always been known for its violent personality. “It barrels down the straights like it wants to exit the stratosphere”, Khan laughed, “but it can’t turn to save its life. Removing traction ► control means just surviving the race is half of the fun”. What made it bearable — and, in fact, brilliant — was the wheel-to-wheel action it created.

According to Khan, the choice of tighter, smaller circuits ensured that nobody ever disappeared into the distance. “The battles were the best part by far”, he said. “Cars kept close and battled for laps on end, with tires melting away in true Porsche fashion so you were never truly down and out. ABS gave just enough help to keep the cars on track, but you had to fight for every corner”. For him, that mix of chaos and closeness was what made the series special: a car on the edge, drivers on the limit, and rivalries built corner by corner.

Unfortunately, not everyone got to see the season through. Attendance became an issue in the later rounds, and by the final stages, the grid had thinned considerably. Some races ran with barely a handful of drivers, and one round was even cancelled outright when not enough people showed. For those invested early on, it was a sobering way to close what had been a thrilling ride.

But for Khan and others who threw themselves into the Ten10 Porsche Cup, the memories remain vivid. The intensity of the format, the sheer brutality of the car, and the relentless side-by-side racing made it, in Khan’s words, “the best racing I’ve ever had online”.

It was a season that burned brightly and briefly — unforgiving, exhilarating, and ultimately fleeting. And perhaps that’s why those who lived it won’t forget it anytime soon. ■

